An Open Letter to AkzoNobel Stakeholders

At PPG, we have a long, proven history of consistently executing strategic actions to grow our business and create value – strengthening our company for the benefit of all stakeholders. We continue to invest more annually in research and development than any other paint and coatings company, and are a leader in sustainability as judged by the many awards received directly from our customers, external research and development organizations and governments.

Our stakeholders count on us to make investments and take decisive actions that will help us grow and create a more sustainable business that is better positioned for the future. This includes successfully integrating more than 50 acquisitions and executing several key divestitures during the last 15 years. That's why we continue to believe that a combination of PPG and AkzoNobel presents a unique and compelling opportunity for the future.

PPG operates around the world to meet our customers' needs. We are not a U.S. business, but a global business with a significant presence in every major region of the world, including five important locations and about 1,000 PPG associates in the Netherlands. Since we produce paint, a product that doesn't ship economically over long distances, we will continue to have local plants and employees in the regions where our paint is consumed.

PPG has a proven, demonstrated record of executing on strategic actions and driving performance and growth. Over the last 10 years, we have successfully grown from $10 billion to $15 billion in sales and from 32,000 to 47,000 employees, creating more opportunities worldwide and generating more cash to invest in research and development, sustainability initiatives and our local communities. Over this period, PPG's total shareholder return was 282 percent, as compared to AkzoNobel's 87 percent.

We are continually evaluating options to build on this track record. That's why it should not be a surprise that we approached AkzoNobel to discuss the possibility of combining the two companies. Actually, in late 2013, we engaged in a private discussion with AkzoNobel about the possibility of combining the two companies. AkzoNobel was not interested and remained internally focused over the ensuing years; a period of significant activity and growth opportunity in the coatings industry.

We continued to see the merits of a combination and decided to make a private, formal proposal in early March 2017. I met personally with Mr. Büchner for lunch and provided him with a formal proposal conveying PPG's offer to combine with AkzoNobel. I made clear our desire to maintain the confidentiality of the proposal and to negotiate privately to reach an agreed-upon transaction. Unfortunately, the following week, in response to market rumors, AkzoNobel announced publicly not only that it had received our proposal but also that it had rejected that proposal without ever seeking to discuss and engage with us.

Only after publicly rejecting our private offer did AkzoNobel change its strategic course. Based on its own commentary last week, AkzoNobel is only now "developing" a new strategic plan, which we continue to believe will be more risky, create more uncertainty for AkzoNobel employees, leave AkzoNobel with stranded costs from the divestiture, and create less value than our proposal.

We have heard concerns raised that our prior proposals contained "few commitments or tangible solutions." When PPG bought AkzoNobel's North American Decorative Coatings business, we made 18 specific and measurable commitments to the Canadian government. We met or exceeded all of the commitments over the required three-year period because we had access to appropriate levels of due diligence when we bought the business. PPG is prepared to make similar commitments with clear solutions to the stakeholders' concerns. This is only possible, though, when PPG and AkzoNobel sit down constructively together.

At PPG, we evaluate all options before making strategic decisions and we regard this as a good governance standard. I would submit that it is now time for AkzoNobel's Management and Supervisory boards to meet with PPG and finally complete a full review and consideration of the compelling opportunity to combine PPG and AkzoNobel for the benefit of all stakeholders. We will be stronger together.
